A regular jet service connects Montréal to Frobisher Bay, 290 km (180 mi) from the park, with connecting flights to Pangnirtung and Broughton Island.

Inuit guides are available and snowmobiles and boats may be rented. Visitors may also fly in by light aircraft, subject to park regulations.

The attraction of Auyuittuq National Park lies in its essential wilderness. To preserve this environment, automobiles, hovercraft and other all-terrain vehicles are not permitted. Aircraft may land to drop off parties and equipment if the park superintendent approves the dropoff points in advance. Only fuel for return flights may be stored at such points and empty fuel drums must be flown out.

In order to preserve all aspects of the environment for future generations, it is not permitted to collect specimens of rock, vegetation or wildlife: this includes bones, fossils and other artifacts. Scientific parties should apply to the Director, Quebec Region, Parks Canada, for information on collection permits.

For their protection and safety, all visitors must register at the Park Administration Office in Pangnirtung or Broughton Island.
